The work of Daniel Dewar & Grégory Gicquel violates the pre-established codes of sculpture and features a physical reengagement with materials and processes, including embroidery, weaving, ceramics, wood and stone carving. A strong awareness surrounding craftsmanship and tradition allows the artists to continuously expand their medium and its reach. The display of erudition and joyful anarchy present in their work is offset by the many ways in which the used references glance back at the past, casting an ironic shadow on the present.

A few things I know about Pompeii: As a city it seems to have been oriented to a warm consideration of all sensual matters. Numerous brothels and bathhouses were found during the excavations, all decorated with tantalizing erotic murals. Among the human figures preserved under the layers of volcanic ash there is a couple, closely curled up together. Recent scans and DNA tests reveal that the two figures are male, giving cause to speculations about the nature of their eternal embrace. All Pompeii figures have become one with the ruins that were once their homes. Encapsulated in the same material, it is hard to tell where a body ends and the soil begins. Touch them and they will crumble. Ashes and dust and so forth.

Daniel Dewar & Grégory Gicquel's sustained investigation of ceramic sanitary wares such as bidets, sinks, and soap dishes relates to the traditional craft of manufacturing containers. A physical barrier, for example a stone vase, is created in order to control and contain another amalgamation of matter, like water, that has no other barrier than its own skin.

Rosa Aurora Rosa, or Estremoz Pink, is an impressive marble with varying shades of pink as its background color and with strong veining. Sometimes, the pink can be very bold. In geological terms, it is probably enough to refer to Rosa Portuguese as a limestone of approximately 400 million years old. It is extracted in the area of Alentejo, which consists of a triangle formed by the communities of Vila Viçosa, Estremoz, and Borba.

A vase is not only a depository, it also dispenses. We pour liquid into it (always already revealing a preceding chain of sources pouring out into one another) only to pour it out again. The carefully carved out water taps and showerheads, but also the bidets and the sinks: all runs through them. Though muted by their rocky matter, the works shown here evoke the pulsing rhythm of pouring and emptying. All flows. It's sinks and taps all the way down.

The main aim of figurative sculpture has always been to achieve perfect mimesis: the muscles of the marble wrestler should ripple; the carved Venus' buttocks should be plump. Despite museum regulations, the urge to rub and caress a sculpture is the best proof of success when sculpturally depicting the human form. We all like to be touched, and the best sculptures seem to long for it as much as we do.
The Nudes series reveals the self-awareness of the practice of Daniel Dewar & Grégory Gicquel. These are sculptures at work, showing what on the one hand might be only the beginning, or, on the other hand, the excavation of something longtime finished. Sensuously sleeping ruins, or vital organs piercing through the surface. Paused between being trapped and being freed. Spilling, or being spilled.

_The artists in their own words:_

_On a beach, amongst the pink rocks, black stone blocks. Small pools of clear water between the boulders, Body and skin in contact with the polished surface._

_A bathroom._

_To extract this incipient monument,_

_To find this moment again,_

_A basin, a bathtub, a bidet,_

_Sculpted out of pink stone._

_The glitter from the sand is sparkling._

_Sanitary ware — washbasins, bidets, toilets, and a bathtub —_

_Are carved out of a block of pink marble stone._

_Smooth, rounded, hollow objects emerge from the material._

_The mineral sends these modern furnishings back to a state of nature. In the garden, the monument evokes nude bodies in an idyllic world._

The material and formal intelligence of the artists shows itself once more in _Stone Marquetry with Body, Soap Dispenser and Taps I, II and III_, as well as in _Stone Marquetry with Vase, Soap and Pipe I and II_. The series proves that the flow cannot be held back. In the humorous unraveling of a peaceful domestic still life, not only do liquids start to appear, but also the taps, the dispenser, and the buttocks start to droop, to twist, morph, and melt. These wall-mounted stone plaques suggest fluidity not only of ideas and images, but also of the material itself. A flux of figures passes through the stone. Minerals come to a halt, take shape, and then pour on.
